From the Foreward:

I've heard it said that two things pierce the heart: beauty and pain.

“Loneliness: Reflections from Exile” is truly written out of a state of brokenness. This threadbare honesty, vulnerability, and purity of passion are the dialect of this abandoned generation. We speak the common language of pain. These words are like a modern-day book of Psalms.

The passages take us to such a personal and candid window into the author's life—like reading entries from his journal. But the value and interest behind these reflections lies in his obsession with the “Rock that is higher than I.” Stating simply that we can embrace any and all circumstances not because they feel good but because our God is bigger! And He is worthy.

Thank goodness this is not another self-help book. It asks questions instead of giving answers and it offers hope instead of solutions. Because THE answer and THE solution is the person of Jesus Christ. And this is an invitation to journey through an eternal relationship with the Living God!?
