Phoenix left the party exhausted. Her friends were fun, but they were a little bit more wild than she was. They wanted to drink and carry on all night long in a house blaring with music and snacks and beer, but all she wanted to do was head on home and finish her own private marathon of reality television.

These people were great, but they weren't the best types of people for someone who was as much of an introvert as she was.

Phoenix had always been a big girl, and even though she had always heard that some big girls had trouble making friends because of their low self-esteem, that was a problem she herself had never faced. She had always been a very happy girl, and confident, outspoken, and lively.

It was no wonder her friends didn't realize what an introvert she truly was. It was a difficult path to be on, when everyone loves you so much that they demand your attention and your point of view on everything because you know just how to deliver it with the perfect comic flair.

It was pretty exhausting to be in such high demand when half the time what she really wanted to do was go sit in a corner and read a book.

Well, reading books hadn't really gotten her anywhere good, except through college and in a career that she really loved.

The thing about books was that they opened up your mind to things you never thought were possible before, and even if you did think they were, you might have to watch yourself carefully because real life and fiction were always going to be a little bit different from each other.

You had to learn to tell the difference yourself, and that was something that got a lot of people into trouble.
